Transparency in supply chains of the garment industry helps to promote workers' rights. First, local unions and civil society organizations can more swiftly alert brand officials to worker rights concerns in their supply chains; second, they can also help the company keep track of unauthorized units engaged in production without approval.

The move toward transparency in this area began more than a decade ago, when many universities in the United States started requiring such disclosures by companies that produce collegiate logo apparel. Since then a growing number of apparel companies have published the names and addresses of their supplier factories. But too many companies, and the factories that make their clothes, remain in the shadows.

There is a need for industry-wide minimum standards for publishing supply chain information. The Transparency Pledge, endorsed by a global civil society coalition, outlines a standard approach for transparency in the garment industry. The Transparency Pledge is a floor. The Follow the Thread report provides useful information on additional actions global apparel companies should take beyond the Pledge and includes tips on how to publish supplier factory information.

A number of apparel companies committed to implementing the Transparency Pledge by December 31, 2017. These are adidas, ASICS, C&A, Clarks, Cotton On Group, Esprit, G-Star RAW, H&M, Levi's, Lindex, New Look, Next, Nike, Patagonia, and the Pentland Group. I respectfully request you to commit to the Transparency Pledge and implement it by February 15, 2018.

The Apparel and Footwear Supply Chain Transparency Pledge ("The Transparency Pledge")

This Transparency Pledge helps demonstrate apparel and footwear companies' commitment towards greater transparency in their manufacturing supply chain. Transparency of a company's manufacturing supply chain better enables a company to collaborate with civil society in identifying, assessing, and avoiding actual or potential adverse human rights impacts. This is a critical step that strengthens a company's human rights due diligence. Each company participating in this Transparency Pledge commits to taking at least the following steps by December 31, 2017.

Publish Manufacturing Sites

The company will publish on its website on a regular basis (such as twice a year) a list naming all sites that manufacture its products. The list should provide the following information in English:

1. The full name of all authorized production units and processing facilities.
2. The site addresses.
3. The parent company of the business at the site.
4. Type of products made.
5. Worker numbers at each site.

Companies will publish the above information in a spreadsheet or other searchable format.
