Introduction

I started get some interest in ophicleide in june 2012. I first got the opportunity to try a friend's instruments and got immediatly fasinated. I then started to read disserations, articles, time newspapers, and searched over the web in order to understand the influences of this instrument. In fact, most of the articles and dissertations I got to read were speaking about the same composers : Berlioz and Mendelssohn. In the best case, some well intentioned people have been making some preliminary ophicleide repertoire research, but it was really basic (the work list was not exceeding 50 titles), and the sources were not mentionned. By speaking about it with ophicleide and tuba players around me, I noticed that no one did hear about research or more full repertoire. So I decided to take a chance : I needed anyway to make a research for my Master degree in Sibelius Academy in Finland.

Initially, the repertoire was supposed to be only a part of my research, I had more interest on the reasons to use, or not use ophicleide in orchestra. But since the list grew and grew I decided to make it as a research itself. This ophicleide catalogue will inclued a list of works for orchestra, religious music, wind band, chamber music and methodes. For each work, I have been trying to find details such as : year of composition, instrumentation and sources.

This research made me "rediscover" about 1500 works including orginally ophicleide. I was not expecting to find more than 300-500... By reading dissertations, and discovering other uses of this instrument in opera orchestras, churches, and as bass for dance music, I realized that this instrument is more than a short-time predecessor of the tuba : it is part of the 19th century orchestra sound.

How I did proceed

For making this catalogue, I took work lists for ophicleide I found on the web and inside the Tuba Family Book by Clifford Beavan¹. This helped me to make a frame to this work, and gave me the really first hints.

Then I red a lot of dissertations and older research made around ophicleide. This permitted me to get an idea of the instrument itself, but also discover some composers that composed works scoring ophicleide.

The next step was to find out libraries or online databases that give possibilities to make a search by word. By typing "ophicleide" in the "search box", I did find out a lot of things.

I also spent some time reading 19th century news papers. This way of proceeding is really easy, since the computer is searching everything that is close to "ophicleide" (or ofikleide, ophykleide and all the variants..) It was interesting to read these - mostly concert reviews - work editions, instrument for sale, etc.., but unfortunately and surprisingly, in the case of concert reviews, it was not always mentionned precisely which work was performed. For example in the case of Colasanti (an ophicleide virtuose) it is written that he played really amazingly with great virtuosity without the precision of the piece he performed². Since quite often it was this kind of review, and because of my limited amount of languages knowledge, I restriced this news paper reading to Finland, Switzerland and a part of the German and French ones. There is probably a lot of interestings articles, but I noticed that it was not the best way for doing this catalogue.

Having the sources is what is the most important to me. So when I didn't had a source (for example works that came from websites) I just typed in google the composer name and "ophicleide". At this point the list became bigger and bigger : I discovered, by complete luck, databases I didn't know and that were including an enormous amount of works.

I tried very hardly to keep my working process sistematic. This metodic way of working allowed me to add the work to my list and cross - use a lot of different databases. I have to mention that a lot of time, I did discover things by luck : I didn't know some databases, or by googling and persistingrought the results landed on some antic – book online shop !

After digging out all the works I had in my list, I turned myself to the composer catalogues. This is a really good and reialable complement to the internet databases. Some works are in the composer catalogue and not in the internet and the opposite. This method is the most complete possible with the possibilities I have here : internet and physical libraries in Music-House in Helsinki. I am aware that there are probably plenty of works stored in a carton boxes at the very bottom of some libraries. But it is the best I could do with my scope.

Finally, I did search on the Groove Music Online the composers name, and when there was a composition list, I copied it in my file. So if a composer has a work list of 100 pieces, and that in my list there is only one or two, it significates that there is a big chance that some other works might incluede ophicleide as well.

I also got some rare chances to converse (over Skype and emails) with ophicleide interested people around the world. Unfortunately too rarely I didn't got any answer to my questions...

Difficulties encountered for making this repertoire :

- A lot of scores are available on the net, too often, it's "only" the vocal score³.
- For some pieces, there are many different versions – an Italian and German one – it just makes more difficult to know if instrumentation was the same or not⁴.
- In some occasions, I could find out ophicleide is mentioned as present in a database, but not in the composer catalogue, or on another database. This means that either there is a mistake somewhere, or that there are different versions of the same work in different places and that they have not been put together⁵.
- Editors or copists, are also making a bunch of things less clear : Some do modify and correct things "in the way they thought it should have been done". This means that some might have added ophicleide on the score for replacing the serpent (or other instruments) or also that they might have added tuba to substitute the ophicleide (or might have written a full part one octave lower...) In the first case, it is quite easy to notice the problems : the work was composed before 1817, and therefore it is impossible to have scored an instrument that was not invented yet. In the 2nd case, it is more difficult, because ophicleide was already invented⁶.
- I tried to establish contact with different composer's foundations or associations, music editions. Often I didn't get any answer, or got an answer more than 2 months after I sent email. Although I took notes and lists to know to people I wrote, it makes things difficult.
- I experienced as well problems with webpages. Worldcat shows once in a while : "An error has occurred. Please try your search again later". I occurred such troubles with this page everytime I tried to read it. So at some point (8th of June 2014) I gave up.

- Some sources are manuscript selling websites. It can be that it was my only source⁷.
- Itanian composers : Bellini – Verdi – Rossini: cimbasso is most of time mentionned. Since tuba arrived in Italy only in 1880's. Cimbasso wasthe term used for the brass instrument that could play the part⁸.
- Some pieces have many different names. Makes it difficult to know if yes or not it is the same music without the parts⁹.
- For some reasons, some smaller libraries, are not taken in consideration by bigger libraries¹⁰.
- I couldn't access to a lot of dissertations made in mid 20th century. I really think that some of these are containing a lot of informations.

Description of databases I used :

As I wrote higher, the finding library - database process, was hazardous. I found them sometimes by luck. Which is somehow logical, because I guess it is how things happen by making such reacherch, but also somehow disappointing : I might have missed some additional results. Anyway : here is the list of the one I found. I didn't mention the one that didn't give any interesting results. Because it is absolutely not interesting to read what didn't give satisfaction. Also a big amount of libraries, have the fantastic by Berlioz, but nothing else... Which is absolutely not what I was – and am – looking for.

About the list of works that might contain ophicleide¹⁴

The goal of this list, is to give an idea of the material that might have ophicleide in. It doesn't seem so interesting, and even not capital. But it shows that the list of works that included ophicleide for sure, is extremely small, and proves that it might be only the tip of the iceberg. I did copy them straight from groove (Apart otherwise stated). Also it has to be remembered that a big amount of composers do not have yet their full work list in groove.

Anyway, for making it shorter, I did proceed to the following operations :

- every work that was composed before 1817
- most of them that I know are not containing ophicleide. I couldn't go through everything.

This list is really giant.

- Lost material.

14 See Appendix 2

Other use of ophicleide

Because ophicleide is not only an instrument used in french churches and opera houses, here's a exhaustive list of it's different use. I did find out these by reading old dissertations and news papers.

- In circus :

The makeup of these bands are as yet unknown. An 1893 newspaper article quotes a player from the 1833 Bailey's Circus as mentioning that “clarionet bands” (generally 7–10 piece bands of clarinets, natural horns, and serpent or ophicleide) were used.

http://www.oxfordmusiconline.com.ezproxy.uniarts.fi/subscriber/article/grove/music/A2083864?q=William+Perry+ophicleide&search=quick&pos=1&_start=1

- It's use in Brazilia :

Since choro at first referred to instrumental ensembles, the term became associated with instrumental music. The early choro ensembles played polkas, waltzes, schottisches, quadrilles, mazurkas and other dances. They played for parties, weddings, balls, and other social gatherings. The pioneering Choro Carioca, led by the virtuoso flautist Joaquim Antonio da Silva Callado (1848-1880), was the most popular choro ensemble in the 1870s and one of the first known choros.¹⁸ The group established a standard format of guitars, cavaquinho and flute (or another wind instrument such as clarinet). Other instruments were added subsequently to this basic group, including the trombone, ophicleide and, quite a bit later, the pandeiro (tambourine).

The Guitar in the Brazilian Choro: Analyses of Traditional, Solo, and Art Music. By Richard Elbert Miller Washington, D. C. 2006

- Church Music :

Balthasar de Freitas was a composer, copyist, conductor, singer, and multi-instrumentalist. According to his descendants, he was able to play organ, piano, euphonium, guitar, cello, flute, clarinet, trombone, saxophone, and ophicleide. The wind ensemble for which most of the manuscripts from the sub-collection were written could be as small as eight to ten musicians or as big as forty to fifty players. The instruments found in these wind bands are requintas, Bb clarinets, pistons, sax-horns and French horns, trombones, euphoniums, helicons, ophicleides, bombardons, tubas, bass drums, cymbals, and snare drums.

The melodic part was usually transcribed for two wind bass instruments: one in Bb, usually atuba or an ophicleide,⁴⁹⁸ and one in Eb, that could be a helicon, a bombardon, or a contrabass. On the other hand, the chords indicated by the figures in the basso continuo parts were distributed among two or three brass instruments. When two instruments were used, one would be a saxhorn or a French horn, and the other a trombone. In the cases where the chords were distributed for three instruments, they usually would be one saxhorn or French horn and two trombones. These horn and trombone parts have a strict harmonic function. These bass parts were probably performed by whatever bass instrument the conductor had at hand, ranging from violoncello or double bass to ophicleide or helicon.

- Popularity in France and England :

The ophicleide's timbre, full and resonant, was characteristic of both the saxophone (which developed from it) and the euphonium (which replaced it). The ophicleide, considered the baritone/bass voice in the ensemble, was even at times called the euphonion or euphonium. It flourished in France until the 1870's. In England the ophicleide's decline began in the 1860's when "the best ophicleidists were presented with euphoniums as contest prizes."

The "golden age" of euphonium playing by Gretchen Renae Bowles

- It's use in Philippines :

Joseph Montano, Voyage aux Philippines et en Malasie (1886) in his travels in 1879 described the use of a quartet of instruments—"ophicleide, guitare de dimensions invraisemblables, et deux flutes" (p.62-63) in connection with rice planting in Abucay.

- In Cuba :

Martin was a dealer of musical instruments in Paris between 1855 and 1876. The address stamped on the bell of this ophicleide dates the instrument between 1868 and 1873. The ophicleide is almost never used in contemporary Cuban ensembles but was often used in the orquestas típicas even as they transitioned into charangas.

Cuban charanga: class, popular music and the creation of national identity by Ruth m. "sunni" Witmer

The orquesta típica is a Latin American ensemble that integrates "typical" or regional instruments with standard European orchestral instruments in performances of folk and popular music. Probably its first published use was in Cuba in the 1870s, to describe Miguel Faílde's danzón band, consisting of a cornet, a valve trombone, a fígle (ophicleide), two C clarinets, two violins, a contrabass, timbales, and a güiro.

- In USA :

A set of uncut parts, all manuscript, for a Grand March, a Waltz, and a Quickstep. The instrumentation is similar to the above, although the Waltz is written for four Bb clarinets with parts for corno-peans and ophicleides. A set of roughly sewed books containing three manuscript works: Grand March, March, and Col. Vose's Grand March for the following instrumentation: selections are not in his copy, indicating that he probably played much of the repertoire by memory. The following books are in the collection: inette. Instrumentation is uniform, engraving is excellent, and the repertoire is distinguished, including selections from von Suppe, Fr. Abt, Large drum. It is possible that the Bb tenor parts were for trombones. Eb tenor is a misnomer for alto. Probably Eb Scoring is complete for the brass section; piccolo and clarinet are simply additional melodic instruments. It is uncertain what instruments were used on the Bb soprano parts, the melodic and duet lines, but they were probably saxhorns. Instrumentation of the period reflected the practice of various European countries; it consisted of an accumulation of instruments often ill-suited to each other and not en-copyrights of those held at the Library of Congress. - British Military Bands :

British military bands began to use the bass hom in the early nineteenth century, some times simultaneously with the serpent. It was a popular bass to the brasses until the mid- 1830s when it was superseded by the ophicleide.

Apparently, professional ophicleide performers were neither interested in the tuba nor sufficiently challenged by tuba players to train themselves. The ophicleide died out by 1880 along with their players. British military band journals from 1845 through 1900: an investigation of instrumentation and content with an emphasis on boose's military journal. by James C. - Ophicleide use to replace bassoon :

It is that of brass were ever formed unlikely quintets keyed in the Victorian period. They came in to being before there was such a thing as formal band instrumentation. If a band-master could not find a bassoon, an ophicleide or a serpent would do.

- Or contra-bassoon :

L'exécution instrumentale a été plus qu'irréprochable : elle a été étourdissante, il est seulement fâcheux que dans une capitale comme Paris, on ne puisse trouver des artistes pour jouer la contrebasse qu'on a dû remplacer par un ophicléide.

The musical performance was more than blameless : it was amazing, it is only annoying that in a capital like Paris, it is not possible to find an artiste for playing the double bass that we

Result of this research project : <http://ophi.referata.com>

Once I did end this research, I wanted to find a way to make it public. My first idea, and obligation, was to deliver something to the academy office. The big trouble I had, was that the result itself, the interesting part for the ophicleide community, is contained in an excel file which has itself 33 sheets, and 18351 cells. If I would print it out like it is, it would be 288 pages. The major problem is that by printing it out like that would make it barely unreadable and therefore helpless.

So I figured out that the best thing to do would be a website. Easy to read, easy to search, easy to make known all over the world, but not easy to do. I did then contact a really good friend of mine – D. Crisinel - that is familiar with webpages-doing. After speaking about what I wanted, what kind of concept I had in mind etc., he did find the wiki-media pages. In order to import all the datas in the website in an easy way, I modified my file and he did something so that it's possible to import everything on the page in one-click ! Of course, I needed afterwards to check things trough, and fill the page with extra infos etc.

It was really easy to spread the word about this page. I putted it on the facebook ophicleide players on earth group, I send about 20 personal e-mail to people I knew would have interest for this page. And I used some tools that google offers for new webpages. If you type ophicleide repertoire in google, it comes as first result in the list ! In our days, the page is accessed 1-3 times a day, which is – considered how specific the subject is – quite decent. According to google analytics, about 75% of people accessing the webpage are new visitors. Which means that the interest is growing, and that people are using it for planning performances and finding informations on this subject.

For the future of this page, I have some work to do. I already have some friends, that are sending me messages when they find new pieces. The french national library is adding things on the page every day. I would like to add new section with the composer I am searching information on. I strongly wish it would be more participativ. It is really easy to add new works, and infos, but for some reasons, people seem to be scared of that.

Conclusion

This ophicleide catalogue should be taken carefully :

- In this time composers and performers did with the ressources they had. It means that sometimes, the composers would have liked to have a bass – tuba (or a bass saxhorn or a french tuba), but the instrument was not available or the performer was not able to play bass – tuba so he might have played it on ophicleide.
- I did this catalogue by being as methodic, and precise as possible. But it might be possible that some mistakes might have snuck in. Especially in year of composition and instrumentations.
- Some composers scored ophicleide or tuba on the same score⁶ for the reason that they knew their works are played in foreign countries, where ophicleide (or tuba) was not used any more. It allowed people to perform the work with the instrument they masters or owned.
- The small chapter that describes the difficulties I had for making this research should be well remembered : it might explain some differences, or mistake in this list.
- I am sure that despite of the 21st century technology and all efforts I did to find out this repertoire, some works are missing.

⁶ Tom S. Wotton, The Scores of Berlioz and Some Modern Editing Author(s). The Musical Times, Vol. 56, No. 873 (Nov. 1, 1915), pp. 651-656

This catalogue should open the eyes on a repertoire that was really in fashion in this time.
(This doesn't mean that it would still be appreciated by the audiences in our days.) It has also to be mentioned that a lot of music is lost¹⁴. Music that is remaining might only be a small heritage of the ophicleide repertoire.

Although this list will probably grow in the future, it shows how important ophicleide was in 19th century. I hope this will be a decent basis for further and more advanced researches.
