This bibliography (in progress) is part of the Marie-Curie project “Poverty, vulnerability, and family in ancient Greece” (MSCA-IF 101031550- PVF-AG). It seeks to gather the main works that address poverty and socio-economic vulnerability (including legal vulnerability) in the ancient Greek world in order to provide a starting point for those interested in this field of study.

The bibliography includes both specific works on poverty in the Greek world and related issues (such as economic inequality, hunger and lack of resources, the living conditions of poor sections of the population, etc.), and studies that explore vulnerability and poverty at the household level, especially - but not limited to- those addressing the situation of children and women, particularly orphans and widows, as well of the elderly. Studies that do not specifically deal with vulnerability and poverty, but which are interesting because they provide an insight into the socioeconomic and legal situation of these groups, are also included.

Most of the works listed here focus on the situation of citizen families in Athens. However, works that address vulnerability and poverty in other territories and/or in non-citizen households are also compiled. Slavery-related studies, with some exceptions, have not been listed here for several reasons: firstly, because there is already an up-to-date bibliography on slavery in Antiquity and in the Classical World; secondly, because the Greeks themselves tended to link poverty with citizenship (although the written sources also connect poverty and debt slavery, and it is clear too that not all poor people would be citizens); and thirdly and lastly, because slavery, although often entailing a situation of vulnerability, is not always a synonym of poverty.
